Role Description

You graduated from high school with good marks in math, a collection of track and field medals and an interest in Law Enforcement. You felt that the work would suit your personality—friendly and patient, but impossible to push around. You enrolled in the Social Work Faculty at university, borrowing some money and working part-time as a Cafeteria Server for two years while you waited for the next induction of Law Enforcement Trainees.

You kept playing sports for fun and fitness but your competitive instincts found a truly satisfying outlet in the university debating league. You tested your communications skills and logic against the law students' team—and sometimes won! The competition for admission to the Police Training Academy was intense, but you made it. At the end of your first year you had aced your courses in law, investigation, communications and conflict resolution. You did pretty good with numbers too.

Then—disaster! You were seriously injured in a car accident while you and some friends were coming home from a camping expedition. You spent three months in hospital coming to grips with your anger at the careless driver who had nearly killed you and your buddies. You had to learn to be patient while you recovered. A year later, your recovery was complete, except for a tiny limp, but police work was out, and you had a new interest—the insurance business.

Your insurance claim settlement paid off your educational loans. During that process you discovered that your university and police training were also applicable to insurance claims investigation and adjustment. You've decided that the accident is not going to ruin your life. You've done your research and built up your computer skills. You have the personal disposition—a good listener, empathetic and honest. You feel quite confident that if you can get an interview, you can talk your way into a job.

You are 23 years old.
