Role Description

You graduated from high school with good grades, above average in English, social studies, and French. What you did most of in high school was meet people, make friends and have fun. Your lifelong dream has been to travel. The main event of your final year was a school trip to Europe—you babysat for months to buy the charter ticket. It was worth it. You set your sights on a career in travel and tourism.

When school ended (big party!), you started looking for work to finance some training. You spotted an ad for Cruise Ship Attendants, no experience necessary. When you showed up at the hotel ten minutes early, polished to a shine, with your résumé in hand, there were already a hundred people there—just as shiny! When your brief interview came you turned on the charm. One interviewer was introduced as Monsieur LePage. Without even thinking, you greeted him “Bonjour, Monsieur.” A week later you got a call, telling you to report for three days training before boarding ship.

That job was an education. As a novice, you cleaned cabins and recreation areas. You weren't allowed to socialize on the sunny upper decks, but met some passengers anyway, and picked up some French and German phrases, making friends as usual. You didn't get ashore much, which disappointed you, but you made the most of every chance. When you were offered another trip after six months, you decided it wasn't for you and went home to get some training.

Now you have just finished an intensive one year program in International Business which included a four month workterm. You've learned computer skills, foreign currencies, transportation options, and general information about foreign economies. You know about many different possibilities in the trade sector, and you're on the lookout. Who is going to appreciate your high energy, great communications and people skills enough to give you a chance at another plane ticket?

You are 20 years old.
