Role Description

When you graduated from high school your report card was reasonable, with good marks in English and math, but no academic specialties leaping off the paper at you. However, you had already found your general direction. You'd really enjoyed volunteering as a kitchen helper for Meals On Wheels. And your friends, sighing with contentment after a sandwich you'd slapped together or a barbecue you'd spent a week planning, had said with real conviction, "You should be a Cook."

You thought about it one day. They were right. You'd seen a TV show about the small percentage of people that have an extremely keen sense of smell and taste. These people often work as tasters, perfume blenders and, of course, cooks. You know you are one of those people—you can smell food and identify the main ingredients. If something is even a bit off it smells positively poisonous to you. Not only that but you are highly responsible and quite perseverant. You good at planning how you will undertake the various things you must do. You have all the required tools or resources on hand. You don't like going on a fishing expedition when you start a job. You measure once and are very exacting. You love working with numbers.

You checked the library careers section to see what employers looked for. Neat and tidy—no problem, you take good care of yourself. Well organized? Check. You enjoy planning the menu, the grocery list, the action

Dishwashing is a hard job, you discovered, very physically demanding, but you did it with good will and the hotel hired you full-time when you graduated one and a half years ago and gave you more food preparation tasks. You like the hectic atmosphere and it's been great experience but you want a new learning opportunity, and more money, so you're watching the newspapers daily.

You are 19 years old.
