Role Description

When you graduated from high school your marks were decent all-round. Although you had enjoyed the social life in high school you looked forward to moving on. Your aunt had given you an old car which absorbed all your free time and most of the wages you earned pumping gas part-time at a local service station. Working from a manual, you got the engine running smoothly but the body work was another story and the old car never was fit to licence and drive away in. You were passionate about cars, how every thing worked and how to replace, rebuild and what was possible.

However, you'd discovered that you enjoyed mechanics and had the strength, dexterity and patience the job requires. You like the friendly, co-operative atmosphere at the service station and the satisfaction of fixing things and making them work. Your boss at the service station strongly encouraged you to get some training, and offered to keep you on part-time while you attended a technical college.

For the next two years you worked part-time as a Tire Technician at the service station and went to school, studying Automotive Technology in theory and practice, as well as polishing your communications skills, and learning about the different specialties in the field of mechanics. You seemed to have a knack for fuel systems and engines. Heavy equipment also interested you because Operators and Mechanics in that industry move around a bit, following the work. When you earned your trade certification in Automotive Technology a year ago your boss took you on full-time, but you know the job won't last long. The neighbourhood is changing and property developers are making offers all the time. Your boss has told you he's just waiting for the right moment to sell out and take an early retirement. You're looking for a job that will use the training and experience you've acquired while giving you a chance to learn more and expand your options. Check the papers!

You are 22 years old.
