Role Description

When you graduated from high school your best marks were in science because you're so curious about how things work. You'd done pretty well in English too, once a teacher pointed out that you should do your assignments on subjects that really interested you, which, in your case at the time, was stereo equipment and sports gear. You started researching facts in consumer information magazines for your essays and reports and found the articles about the product tests really interesting.

Your family ran a small construction business and you had grown up knowing how to use tools. You'd worked a couple of summers as an electrician's helper, wiring houses, but you really didn't like the noise and dust of construction sites. When you saw an ad for Electronic Assembly Workers you applied for it just to avoid another summer wiring houses with circular saws going constantly all around you.

You scored high on a manual dexterity test and were hired to assemble stereo equipment. You found it really interesting at first and learned increasingly complex skills, solving problems but found the work kind of lonely, and a couple of years later you were getting bored. You brought a carton of components to the Product Test Lab one day and did a double take when you recognized the scene from the magazines you'd enjoyed in high school.

You talked to the people in the test lab and shortly afterwards left your job to enroll in a technical college. They took your work experience into account and offered you a one year program in Electronic Testing to learn basic electronic theory, testing techniques, mathematics and physics and testing equipment. They also helped you arrange a small loan. You enjoyed the training and did well, but now it's time to look for work again.

You are 21 years old.
