Role Description

You graduated from high school with excellent marks in English and social studies and won a year's scholarship to university for your essay "Why I Love History." You had discovered that reading good historical novels was a pleasant way of learning. You began exploring the university library a couple of years before you finished high school and could find books on every topic of interest. You were also very adapt at electronic searches.

You entered university to study history with library science as a minor. When you met others who shared your interests, your quiet, friendly personality came out and you became increasingly confident in your dealings with people. You showed respect for all. Your endless curiosity about the mysteries and dramas of the past ensured your interest in your studies. When your history professor asked for volunteers to work on an archival project team, you jumped at the chance.

A very old judge had left all his books and papers to the local library, which he had helped establish. The librarians sorted out the books which needed special care and those which could be used in the reference section. Volunteers, led by the professor, sorted through the papers, including the judge's essays, journals, and letters. The volunteers carefully identified and catalogued the papers as they packed them into boxes for the University Archives.
