Role Description

You graduated from high school with good marks in English and social studies. You belonged to the student council and enjoyed team projects at school. Friendships, and volunteer activities at the children's hospital, were important to you because you really care a lot about people. You have a good sense of humour and your friends value your insight and often take your advice. People have always confided their problems to you because you are open-minded, sensitive, and a really good listener.

You always thought the guidance counsellor had an interesting job and you asked him about it. He told you that it was excellent if you liked teenagers and were interested in career planning. He showed you how to find out about jobs in the area of helping and advising people. You started to look into it during your last year of school and spent every Sunday evening at the hospital reading to sick kids whose parents couldn't be with them.

You enrolled in university in the Social Work Faculty and volunteered at the student outreach centre on campus. You helped other students find information they needed and when people were in serious difficulty you referred them to appropriate services. Later you were hired as an Outreach Worker for a three month summer project with street kids. The project affected you deeply. Learning about society's problems in the classroom is a different story from seeing the real pain and confusion in peoples' eyes.

You started directing your course work towards youth issues because it was becoming clear to you that today's at-risk kids become tomorrow's hospital and prison statistics. Now you have just received your Bachelor's Degree in Social Work and you are anxious to start doing something useful. You have decided to look for work and study part-time towards your Master's Degree for the next three or four years. You want a job where you can help young people turn their lives around before it's too late.
