Role Description

You graduated from high school with above average grades, especially in English, math, and social studies. You won a few worthy track and field medals and have lots of great memories from wilderness expeditions with the orienteering club. An attractive recruiting ad for the Armed Forces on the school bulletin board mentioned free training, travel, and challenge. The people in the photo looked very healthy, competent, and high-tech. You requested more information.

It was a serious commitment. To qualify you had to have above average grades and fitness. The technical training you wanted required a minimum three year contract. Travel and challenge might come as a sudden departure to a dangerous part of the world. Signing up meant trusting the government not to put you at risk unless it was totally necessary. You are an optimistic person and you knew you could count on others to do their best. You research it thoroughly and decided to enroll.

Aptitude tests confirmed Survey Technology as your field of study and you were accepted. Basic training probably would have killed you if you weren't so fit to start with. You learned to use and maintain a gun and a mountain of personal equipment that you could fit into a rucksack. You learned to survive in rough terrain and developed excellent team working and problem solving skills.

After Basic, you entered a three-year college program to earn a diploma in Geomatics Technology, the modern, computer-assisted version of surveying. You are expert in Global Positioning Systems and Geographical Information Systems which rely on satellite fixes to determine exact positions on earth's surface. Your unit didn't get sent on a foreign peacekeeping mission but you did flood relief work, carrying tons of sandbags until the water receded, and then re-surveying the whole area. You have fulfilled your contract with the armed forces and are looking for a job to put your skills and experience to work.

You are 22 years old.
