Role Description

You graduated from high school with good grades in English, French, and social studies. You were always on the move. Excellent organizational and interpersonal skills enabled you to juggle Student Council activities and the debating league and still have time to work weekends, flipping burgers. You manage your time well and thrive on the rush of deadlines and hectic activity.

The youth caucus of a major political party was your social scene and your training ground. You volunteered in high school, delivering flyers, because the party supported a social justice issue you thought was really important. By the time you and the other volunteers had cleaned up after the big election night party, politics was in your blood. The executive assistant for the candidate was impressed with your enthusiasm, optimism, initiative and told you that you should pursue a political career.

You wanted a good background in the theory and history of political systems, so you enrolled in university to study political science and communications. You immediately engaged in student council politics and were elected yourself for a couple of terms. That's when you realized that you preferred teamwork and strategy to being in the limelight. You value your personal privacy too much to really enjoy the constant attention and scrutiny that focus on an elected representative. You prefer research, planning, and co-ordination behind the scenes.

You graduated with a Bachelor of Arts Degree in Political Science and qualified for a special program that places graduates in foreign embassies as Diplomatic Interns for one year. You worked at an embassy in North Africa, polishing your French and learning about diplomacy—the art of getting what you want in the nicest possible way. Now that the year is over you have decided that the diplomatic corps is not for you—you need some excitement—like an election campaign! Time to update your résumé!
