Role Description

You graduated from high school with excellent marks in English and social studies. With your logical, analytical mind and good public speaking skills, you excelled in the debating league. You have a passion for justice and were famous for writing long letters to local papers about youth issues. However, you are patient enough to do good research for your arguments and tolerant enough to respect other points of view.

During high school you became involved in a polluted river reclamation team. The river was close by your house so you and your family pitched in to help remove garbage and debris when a local environmental group called for volunteers. The following summer they returned for the second phase of rebuilding and replanting the eroded river banks and you joined in again. By then you felt a sense of pride in the river—and had a lot of respect for the hard-working environmentalists.

You entered university to study Social Sciences for two years. You also took some courses to give you a general knowledge of natural sciences, and then qualified for law school in spite of very stiff competition. You were particularly interested in environmental law and international trade law was also on your agenda because you could see it becoming an issue in cases such as the transportation of toxic chemicals across borders.

You buried yourself in books for three years, studying case law and precedents. Lively discussions in class made the tedious work in the library worthwhile. One professor told you that there were not enough positions opening for all the graduates to do their articling (like a doctor's internship) and become practicing lawyers. But he said that there would always be room for the best, and for those with a specialty in a growing field. You earned your Bachelor's Degree in Law with honours. Now you're ready to get out there and save the world—and start paying off your student loans.

You are 24 years old.
