Role Description

You graduated high school with average marks in all your subjects. You enjoy English and business correspondence along with office procedures. You were always something of a social butterfly and had several good friends. In fact your schedule was so full that you were always on your blackberry scheduling dates for friends and social events. You are always having to say "hold on let me check my schedule," or "I'll pencil you in for Monday night".

You volunteered for office duty because you loved the hustle and bustle of the office. You loved helping out and answering questions over the phone. The office staff really appreciated your friendly attitude and your impeccable organization skills. Your friends would find you eating your lunch in the office reorganizing the various lists, detention book and other things that needed filed but that were difficult for school staff to get to.

Your father wanting you to know the value of the dollar got you a summer job working at his corporate company as the head secretary's assistant. She definitely appreciated your knack with computers and your ability to input 80 wpm. You became good friends with her and chatted about your social life and your future. You told her you were unsure if school was right for you. She suggested taking some courses that interested you and that you would enjoy doing.

While surfing the web on your break, you came across some computer courses that you thought looked good. A couple of clicks with your mouse and some fast finger typing you were signed up for the courses in seconds. You passed with flying colours and learned a lot while making friends along the way.

You are 22 years old.
