Role Description

You graduated high school with good marks in all your subjects but you were fascinated by biology and chemistry. Fishing and hunting has always been an important part of your family. The hunting camp that your family owned has kept you outdoors for most of your life and has made you truly appreciate nature. You knew for sure that the outdoors was where you wanted to work and yet the opportunities seemed endless.

You decided to take a general science program at your local college. Your summer job was at a nearby provincial park where you were in charge of renting canoes and kayaks to the campers. You realized that the staff that had year round jobs were specialist and worked inside most of the time. The other staff members spoke of their university education and how they had to take regular courses sponsored by their employers. Your supervisor was often impressed with your dependability and told you of the compliments from the campers on your communication skills. Your supervisor often talked to you about your career plans and encouraged you to think about working towards a degree.

In your second year of college you decided to transfer into a degree-granting program. You were able to transfer most of your credits to a neighbouring university. Your previous summer employer said they would hire you on as a fish warden. You had never thought of yourself as a law enforcement officer. You quickly realized that the fishermen recognized the authority of your position and that we all hold a joint responsibility to protect the environment.

Your summer job as an enforcement officer gave you a new appreciation for the many different jobs available. In your last year of school you decided you wanted to work in the public service. Your summer job had provided you with a valuable experience and reference letters that would be useful in your job search. In your last semester you started to look in earnest.

You are 23 years old.
